PROCLAMATION.

In the annals of human progress—in all of the history of man's effort to self-uplift—there is nothing more interesting than the tragical story of Labor.

Since it was first ordained by the Maker that a man's sweat must be the source and price of his bread the son of toil has been fighting brayely for a just share of the fruits of his industry.

The first brigand upon the face of the earth made the workingman a slave The first idler denies him a sout. The two together have remeined his most persistent enemies under different forms and various names. They have robbed him at every toil gate and market place beneath the shining sun, and what is most inexplicable of all is this, that the civilization which he has founded and conserved has stood by in mute indifference and gave its sanction to the unboly theft.

The laborer has been the first here of all the ages of man. The great cpics of the world do not praise him nor does the history of human valor do him henor, and yet he is the man who has kept armies in the field, maintained navies upon the face of the mighty waters and supported statesmen in the parliaments and chancellories of the world. Every empire from Babylon to Berlin was founded and built upon his brain or his brawn and without him civil government could not exist.

Without his ingenuity we could not have and chancellories of the world. Every empire from Babylon to Berlin was founded and built-upon his brain or his brawn and without him civil government could not exist.

Without his ingenuity we could not have those delicate mechanisms that guide our eyes into distant infinitudes where we discover new worlds, calculate their density, weigh their mass, measure their orbits and come to an orderly realization of the wonderful wisdom of God.

He has made those delicate instruments that warn the farmer of sterms and give the mariner accurate knowledge of the temper and the disposition of the elements. He has gone up into the heavens and harnessed those mysterious forces of air and ether that we employ so profitably in our service. He has bridled turbulent rivers, and cataracts, and hitched them up to the looms and wheels and engines of the industrial world. He has effaced the forest, cut out the highways of commerce and builded the towns and temples and palaces of all the nations. He has made the altars of God and the thrones of kings. He has bored his way into the dark chambers of the earth and brought therefrom the treasures of the mineral world, including those proud and gittering metals that now claim to be his master. His ordering brain and willing hand have made his brothers royal over all living things. He has printed and bound for us the useful knowledge of all the ages including those volumes of science and philosophy that give us the key to all secrets in physical nature and all but reveal to us the solemn mystery of creation.
